One dusk, a tiny star slipped out of the sky and landed in Lina's yard.

Lina scooped it up. It was warm, like a cookie just out of the oven.

"I think you are lost," she whispered. The star blinked, sleepy and bright.

They walked past the quiet houses, the star peeking from her pocket.

At the top of the hill, Lina held it high. "Home is that way."

The star leapt back into the dark, and left a gold wink on her window.

The End

Goodnight, little star.
